

Maine State Museum Collecting Moratorium Statement

What:

Due to the extended renovation of the Cultural Building, the Maine State Museum reopening has been pushed back until Saturday, October 24th, 2026. This has led the Maine State Museum to temporarily continue the moratorium on the collecting of objects to its history collections (history objects, archives, and photographs). During the museum's collecting moratorium, collection loans to other institutions, as well as research visits, will be suspended. This moratorium will be extended for 6 months, to January 1st, 2027. The addition of new specimens and materials to the museum's science and archaeology collections, as well as collections loans and research visits to the science division, will not be affected and will continue as usual.

Why:

The reason for this dramatic action is that the museum must concentrate the work of its history curators, collections management, construction, and administrative staff on the demanding process of developing over 10,000 square feet of new exhibits. The timely completion of these exhibits is vital in order to allow the museum to reopen to the public in 2026. The museum's staff is small, and the process of re-establishing exhibits is massive. We must prioritize the work so that we can reopen to the public without further delays.

What if I want to donate historical materials to the Maine State Museum during this moratorium?:

Contact an appropriate history curator directly. Their listings are below. A museum curator can advise you of the best course of action to take so that your much-appreciated commitment to the Maine State Museum does not become overlooked during this moratorium. The Maine State Museum is our state's largest and broadest guardian of the most important materials representing Maine's history, and of the stories of the Mainers who have contributed to it. We are preserving these materials for you and the people of Maine. We will advise you with respect and consideration.
